Investing in China

Most Asian stock markets were in disarray this week on news of North Korea's nuclear test. But China's Shanghai composite index hit a five-year high Monday on the pricing of the upcoming stock offering of Industrial & Commercial Bank of China Ltd.

The Chinese economy is on a tear. GDP is expected to grow 8.9 percent next year, inflation is low, and exports to the U.S. alone should hit $260 billion this year. China also has vast natural resources and a middle class of 300 million and growing. "China is communist by name, but capitalist in the blood," says Benjamin Wey, president of New York Global Securities and an adviser to China's central bank. The country's politics may bother some investors, but China's political machine has a vested interest in keeping its capitalist system on track: 20 percent of tax revenue is from foreign investment.

U.S. investors have a number of ways to get in on China's growth. There are 149 Chinese companies traded on American stock exchanges. For those more risk-averse, there are dozens of mutual funds and two exchange-traded funds that invest in China. And there are U.S. companies that get a lot of revenue from China. Like any investment, there's homework to be done. But as these returns show, there's money to be made in China.
